Speculation as to the Double Tragedy Almost Endless.

Theories innumerable are being advanced s to the manner in which death came to the

as to the manner in which death came to the secaped murderers. Thomas Pallister and Frank W. Rohle, whose bodies were found floating in the Hudson river, opposite Sing.

That there is a simple explanation of the mystery, there is no doubt, but thus far human ingenuity has failed to account for the many peculiar circumstances accompanying the condition of both bodies when drawn from the water.

In morning, to identify the body of the dead murderer. Detective Jackson is greatly desirous of finding Lawyer Amorea Hurdy Purdy, Pallister's counsel, so that he may also subpoen a him to identify his client's body, but up to noon to-day he had been unsuccessful. The detective learned that Lawyer Purdy had not been home since night before last, and he was not to be found at his office this forenoon. His clerks and family profess to be ignorant as to his whereabouts.

Had Pallister's body not borne the tell-tale ark of the builet the mystery would have been much easier of solution, but both men testified to by the two physicians who perormed the autopsies, nothing remains but to theorize as to the probable events which led up to the double tragedy. The most reasonable explanation and the Given this as a starting point, the question at

Who was the murderer?

From the expert testimony of the doctors it appears that the fracturing of Rohle's skull occurred before death. The diffusion of blood on the surface of the brain under the

This, then, does away with the possibility of Rolle having fired the shot which killed Pallister. The bullet which passed completely through Pallister's print unquestionably produced instant death, or at least incompletely through Pallister's brint unquestionably produced instant death, or at least incompletely through Pallister's brint unquestionably produced instant death, or at least incompletely through Pallister's brint unquestionably produced instant death, or at least incompletely the produced instant death, or at least incompletely incompletely incompletely incompletely incompletely incompletely incompletely incompletely in the produced instant death, or at least incompletely i pictery through Pallister's brain unquestionship produced instant death, or at least immediate unconsciousness, so that he could not have struck Roble the blow after receiving the bullet.

With these facts established, there is no other conclusion to be reached than that Roble died first.

Motive for the murder can easily be found where the men in question were of the stamp of the two criminals.

Both had taken human life before and without the incentive of self-preservation.

The terrible storm on the night of the escape rendered the possibility of a rowboat crossing the Hudson not only extremely dangerous but next to impossible.

Of the two men, Pallister was the sailor.
His experience as a river pirate gave him a anowledge of handling a boat which Roble did not possess. What, then, is more natural than that Pallister should have taken the oars?

With Roble in the stern sheets the two men

the oars?
With Roble in the stern sheets the two men with Roble in the stern sneets no two mean may have started on their perilous journey. Roble, becoming alarmed at the pitching of the boat, may have offered suggestions as to its management, which Pallister, with his superior knowledge of water-craft, may have rejected.

duarrel ensues, and. Roble's murderous that aroused, he makes a motion to draw pistol, which he accomplishes so far as to the weapon out of his pocket, in his haste olds his pocket inside out.

Pailister, accustomed to watching for such motions on the part of his associates, sees the attempt on his life and brings down the oar, ready in his hand, with crushing force on his companion's skull.

Rohle, as is natural falls forward over the side of the boat his pistoid dropping from his nerveless fingers.

Reaching for it, Pallister, to make the side of the boat his pistoid dropping.

side of the boat his pistol dropping from his herveless fingers.
Reaching for it, Pallister, to make sure of no further trouble with Roble sends a builet crashing through the back of the German's skull and to rid the boat of its dend weight dumps the boay into the water.
Of all the theories concerning the death of Roble this seems to be the most logical Pallister's death may have come about in two ways—by accident or deliberate suicidal latent.

Intent.

If the former, it was when, bending forward to see the effect of his shot with the pistol grawn back and recorded for another shot, it became pointed upward.

A sudden lurch of the boat as he tried to regain his seat might have thrown the murderer down, the shock or the unconscious tightening of his grip on the pistol's trigger may have sent the leaden messenger of death ploughing its way through Pallister's brain, and he too toppled overboard.

But this line of reasoning has its weak point in the fact that the boat was found on the opposite shore with both oars in it and drawn up on the beach to a point where, according to the rivermen, it would not have been placed by the tide. It must have been brought there by some human ageacy.

Again, there was no blood found in the boat, as must unquestionably have been the case had the shooting occurred white the men were on the water.

It would seem, then, that there is but one explanation of how the boat got there minus the blood stains.

There was a third man in the boat that

There was a third man in the boat that terrible night.

Was he a friend of Roble or of Pallister, and might not he have shot one or both of the might not he have shot one or both of the men?

This opens up a new line of reasoning which might be followed indefinitely.
Another theory arises from the story, but poorly authenticated, about the mysterious schooner which is said to have been boarded by two men on the night of April 20.
Could both men have been shot by the crew and their bodies raisen overboard, the third man making good his escape and reaching the Rockland County shore?

The letter found in the tin spice box by T.
S. Lynch, the Hoboken mechanic, April 28, may have been thrown overboard by the people on the schooner after having heard of the escape and for the purpose of indirectly apprising the police of the fate of at least one of the fugitives without running the risk of having the responsibility for his death dennitely placed.

Among the comments and theories received regarding this most remarkable incident in the criminal annals of this country is the following:

"To the Editor:
"It is gratifying to know that the efficiency

pallister, the escaped murderer, which was found in the river here yesterday will not be buried in the prison burying ground, as was expected.

It was intended to lay the body beside that of Rohle. This morning, however, a telegram was received from the murderer's mother. She notified the authorities that she would claim her son's body.

Shortly after 11 o'clock this morning Morris Kane, a brother of Probationary Policeman Kane, who was murdered by Pallister, arrived at the prison. He was taken to the dean-house to view the body. Without the dean-house to view the body the folioter. The Editor:

"It is gratifying to know that the foliowing to the bodies of the eccaped murderetty force has been vindicated by the finding to the clotter. "But if the bodies are really those of Roble and Pallister, it is difficult to accept the sing Sing theory that the men who braved the revolvers of the keepers and guards, broke through roofs, dropped from high walls and found themselves at liberty, voluntarily took the lives they had been at so much trouble to save. save.
"It is said that Rohle was the executioner,
"It is said that Rohle was the executioner,

Pallister's mother arrived at the prison shortly after 12 o'clock. She was dressed in deep black. She was greatly distressed and leaned heavily on the arm of her son-in-law, Mr. Parker.

The couple were taken to the dead-house to see the body. The scene which followed was very affecting. The aged mother of the dead murderer broke down when she saw her son's body. She did not say that it was that of her son, but words were not necessary.

Bending down, the old woman kissed the black and swollen features. Her grief was axcessive.

She was gently led away and taken to the Warden's room to recover herselt. The body will be taken to New York and interred in Calvary Cemetery.

WAS THERE A THIRD MAN?

In accordance with subpoenas served on them last night by State Detective Jackson, Mrs. Pallister, mother of Thos. Pallister, and her son-in-law went to Sing Sing on the 10 o'clock train this morning, to identify the body of the dead murderer.

Fearful that Dynamite May Blow the Town to Pieces.

The New York police have reason for congratulating themselves to-day that the Anarchistic meeting in Union Square on the night of May 2, 1892, was treated

At that time there was talk of a dynamite plot, but not until Anarchist Otto Eckholdt repeated on the witness stand in Maspeth, L. I., yesterday, the information he first made known through an exclusive interview in "The Evening World" over a month ago, did Supt. Byrnes and his detectives believe GUILT there was any serious intention among the followers of the red to fight the police as the Chicago Anarchists had done.

Subsequently the former was arrested in Brooklyn on a charge of conspiracy to blow up the factory. He was given a hearing before Justice Schumacker yested terday, and while Eckholdt, who had been brought from the Long Island City Jall to testify, was on the witness-stand he made known in detail the plan to blow up the police.

He swore that the dynamite bombs were manufactured by Eckholdt with the aid of steam pipes, and were then hidden in the factory. On the night of the Junion Square meeting, Eckholdt said Rupprecht was accompanied by about thirty-five Maspeth Anarchists, all prepared to do terrible work. Rupprecht, and coording to Eckholdt, carried a satchel full of bombs and told the latter he would use them if the police interfered. This statement was corroborated by Charles Sayres, who is an Anarchist, and who repeated a conversation he had with Rupprecht in a saloon, inwhich the latter said:

"We will open under the cops' feet if they interfere with us."

Bayres also said he was shown the dynamite.
